Different Types of Tea

Yellow Level Black Tea

Khandaker Yellow Label is a classic, signature blend of black tea known for its rich, bold, and aromatic flavor, designed to be a bright, uplifting, and invigorating experience. Made from high-quality, sun-ripened, freshly pressed tea leaves, it has a balanced taste and a distinctive lively aroma, perfect for both hot and iced beverages. This long-standing blend, dating back over a century.

Black Leaf Tea

Black leaf tea, a variety of tea from the Camellia sinensis plant, is characterized by its fully oxidized processing, which gives the leaves and brewed beverage a dark, reddish-gold or coppery color and a robust, sometimes malty or earthy, flavor. It is a popular choice in the West and contains a moderate amount of caffeine, acting as a natural stimulant.

Different Types of Tea

Orthodox Black Tea

Orthodox black tea is a premium whole-leaf tea processed using traditional methods that involve carefully plucking, withering, rolling, controlled oxidation, and drying of the tea leaves, preserving their structural integrity and resulting in a complex, multilayered flavor profile. Unlike the faster, mass-produced CTC (Crush-Tear-Curl) method, the orthodox process focuses on quality, producing a robust, aromatic brew with a full body.

Green Tea

Green tea is an unoxidized beverage derived from the leaves of the Camellia sinensis plant, characterized by its lighter color, mellower flavor, and high antioxidant content, including polyphenols like EGCG. Unlike black and oolong teas, its leaves are processed with heat, such as steaming or pan-frying, soon after harvest to prevent oxidation.

Different Types of Tea

Herbal Tea

Herbal tea is a caffeine-free beverage made by steeping dried flowers, fruits, leaves, roots, or bark from various edible plants, not the Camellia sinensis tea plant. Also known as a tisane, it's prepared by infusing these plant materials in hot or cold water to extract their flavors and beneficial compounds. Popular types include peppermint, chamomile, and ginger, each offering different flavors and potential health benefits.

Orthodox Tea

Orthodox tea refers to a traditional, often hand-processed method of making tea, as opposed to the automated CTC (Crush, Tear, Curl) method, resulting in whole-leaf tea prized for its nuanced, complex flavors and aromas.

The process involves plucking, withering, rolling, oxidation, and drying to produce high-quality green tea, oolong tea, black tea, or white tea.
